IN A CLOUD RIFT.

BY LUCY LARCOM.

Upon our loftiest White Mountain peak,
Piled with the freshness of untrodden air,
We sat, not cared to listen or to speak
We felt, not cared to question.

To our unsheltered heads, from out the cloud
Which hid the heavens of unlimited air,
Dropped fine and soft, unclouded
Like Hermon's dew.

I knew you! Your eyes impressed me Strangely when I was introduced. Surely this is May Howard, of Madam W.'s school
in D——.

"The same," replied Gertrude. "My school friends preferred to call me by my middle name. I scarcely expected you to recognize in the woman of the world the school girl and the——"

Here the mist into a chair and burst into tears. After a few moments she continued:

She arose from her seat and stood before him saying:

"Mr. Harcourt, look at me! See if you cannot recall my countenance—have you never seen me before?"

A puzzled look passed over his face, and after a few moments' silence he sprung up,
exclaiming:

"I know you! Your eyes impressed me strangely when I was introduced. Surely
this is May Howard, of Madam W.'s school
in D——."

"The same," replied Gertrude. "My school friends preferred to call me by my
